D. Jose: This is a more developed pre-outline of the central part of the study of the Theory of principle. There is, of course, a very limited set of interpretive angles because the purpose of the study is to clarify whether a transcendental order can have a principle or whether in finding a radical principle all transcendental orders just become "fruitful hypotheses". It is also limited because of the immaturity of my mind.

I am enjoying your seminar; enjoying that quality of your expression so close to the 'transparence' of a C. Riba, which makes the obvious speak for mystery without making of mystery an obvious thing, as is so often the case with philosophers of a lesser craft.

Respectfully,
