Dear Mr. Ferrater Mora--

I'm sorry this was rather slow in coming, but I think it's pretty good--that is, I think it does what little it is supposed to do rather well. It doesn't get very deeply into the material in an historical way, but that will come later. At any rate, it's a start. It's written partly as a tentative introduction to the dissertation, and partly for you, as you will note.

I have a copy of it, so if you intended to keep this one you should do so. If, however, you had intended to make comments on rather than merely about it, I have enclosed an envelope for that purpose. But I doubt that you will want to send it back, since I can refer to my copy if necessary.

I think that it would be profitable to attack Leibniz next. It could not be done in an absolutely final form, since the approach will have to be modified in accordance with whatever else is done. But that would be true wherever I plunged in, and since Leibniz is obviously central I think I shall start there. I hope to be well on my way by the time you get this.

Carol and I spent three days at State College, and have rented a very nice five-room cottage about eight blocks from the campus. My teaching schedule has been improved somewhat; now instead of teaching in the year five Humanities sections, three Logic, and one Greek Philosophy, it is to be four, four, and one. It's not ideal, but pretty good nonetheless.

I hope your vacation is enjoyable and profitable (spiritually, that is).

Very sincerely,

Bill Wilson
